Overview of the policy and legislative framework

- 2009 ● The Organic Law No. 2009-022 of 2 April 2009 establishing special arrangements relating to the voting of Mauritians residing abroad, gives every Mauritanian citizen residing abroad the right to register to vote. It also stipulates that electoral operations (voting) must be organised in countries where at least 100 registered Mauritanian voters reside.
- 2010 ● The National Migration Management Strategy (SNGM) addresses a number of diaspora engagement issues, such as the needs to: improve the services for the diaspora by creating a structure that supports dialogue among diaspora organisations; better understand the size and geographical distribution of the diaspora; improve state responsiveness to cases of emergency involving citizens abroad; create an official diaspora representation to better integrate diaspora concerns into national policies; conduct a census of Mauritians abroad; support “co-development projects” that involve diaspora organisations in decentralised cooperation with local communities; and facilitate and reduce the costs of remittances.
- 2016 ● The National Accelerated Growth and Shared Prosperity Strategy (SCAPP) 2016-2030 briefly notes (in the context of attracting foreign investment) the need to create attractive investment conditions for the diaspora, while also recognising (under the objective of strengthening higher education and scientific research) the involvement of the diaspora in supervising theses. Furthermore, the second SCAPP Action Plan (2021-2025) included the elaboration of a diaspora engagement strategy as one of its activities.
- 2021 ● Law No. 2021-016 modifying certain arrangements of law 61-112 of 12 June 1961 on the Mauritanian nationality code allows Mauritians abroad to retain their citizenship when acquiring another (Article 30). The revised law also prevents dual nationals from holding public office (Article 31).<sup>2</sup>
- 2024 ● Joint Decree No. 000140 of the foreign and interior ministries reportedly listed the countries in which voting would be organised for the diaspora.<sup>3</sup> It allowed for only one voting office per continent, despite the 2009-002 law stipulating that voting should be enabled in any country where at least 100 registered voters reside.<sup>4</sup> This prevented numerous eligible diaspora voters, including some of the largest communities in Senegal and Mali, from exercising their voting rights.<sup>5</sup> The government reportedly issued the decree due to their lack of resources to enable diaspora voting.<sup>6</sup>

Trends

Although the diaspora won the right to vote in 2009 and the National Migration Management Strategy that followed a year later addressed a number of diaspora engagement issues, the state’s work on the topic appears sporadic and there is limited publicly available documentation of initiatives. Much activity seems to have taken place since 2017, which marked the start of the first project implemented by the International Organization for Migration (IOM) to facilitate the temporary return of diaspora professionals. The focus on temporary return continued in the years following, with 19 highly qualified members of the diaspora making temporary returns to Mauritania between 2019-2021.<sup>7</sup> In response to the COVID-19 pandemic, 12 of these 19 experts were healthcare professionals who supported the national COVID-19 response plan by facilitating skill transfers to medical personnel and institutions, filling gaps in specialised expertise such as intensive care, and assisting in the establishment of an Emergency Medical Assistance Service.<sup>8</sup>

In 2021, again supported by the IOM, the government began a participatory process to develop a diaspora engagement strategy,<sup>9</sup> although the strategy has not yet been adopted three years on. A Directorate-General of Mauritians Abroad (DGME) was also established within the foreign ministry and a unit was set up within the Investment Promotion Agency (APIM) to assist the diaspora in establishing small and medium-sized enterprises.<sup>10</sup> The Ministry of Higher Education and Scientific Research also built on the aforementioned temporary return initiatives by organising an inaugural Forum of Mauritanian Diaspora Researchers in 2023.<sup>11</sup>

While the diaspora strategy remains pending, the government has taken major, yet seemingly inconsistent, actions on fundamental diaspora rights. In 2021, it removed a longstanding engagement barrier by permitting dual citizenship in a law which simultaneously barred the diaspora from running for public office. Meanwhile, although significant progress was made by allowing the diaspora vote and designating five diaspora parliamentary representation, the government only allowed for one voting office in per continent in the 2024 elections, drawing the ire of the many diaspora members unable to exercise their legal rights.

On the domestic scene, at the same time as the country has been developing its extractives sectors over the years, a policy of “Mauritanianisation” of employment has been pursued to prioritise the employment of the domestic workforce. This has led to international companies operating in these sectors to seek out diaspora talent, in the face of challenges encountered in employing qualified talent domestically, although some have run-up against barriers to hiring diaspora expertise due to certain state-led hiring processes to which they must abide.

Obstacles

- Limited coordination among government agencies: The DGME is charged with coordinating diaspora engagement, although several other government departments and agencies, including the Directorate-General of Employment (which has a unit responsible for diaspora engagement), the Ministry of Higher Education and Scientific Research, and the investment promotion agency also have nominal roles or have implemented engagement initiatives. However, the DGME does not yet appear to have brought visibility or cohesion to the state’s disparate diaspora engagement activities. As a result, diaspora engagement remains fragmented and piecemeal – often limited to projects supported by other partners.

- Absence of clear interface between state and diaspora: Communication between the Mauritanian state and its diaspora remains sporadic and reliant on informal channels, with official representatives often hard to access for those without privileged networks. Many diaspora are unaware of the existence of the DGME. Furthermore, consular services are insufficiently developed to either address diaspora needs overseas, or serve as critical in-person interfaces to build trust with the diaspora.
- National recruitment policy limitations: The recent growth in Mauritania's economy, particularly with offshore gas projects and new interest in green hydrogen, has spurred demand for specialised skills in fields like ICT, project management, and oil and gas. However, international companies have found it challenging to find adequate local expertise in the way that the state's "Mauritanianisation" policy requires. Some companies have tried to attract skilled diaspora members, hoping to bridge this gap, yet these efforts have often been conducted independently, without formal state involvement. Government policy aims to funnel much of the employment within these sectors through the state-led national employment agency (TECHGHIL), and has previously impeded companies from hiring diaspora members not registered at TECHGHIL (citizens abroad can supposedly register at TECHGHIL but diaspora members without Mauritanian citizenship are ineligible).
- Practical barriers to exercising the diaspora vote: As described above, political participation for Mauritians abroad remains restricted due to resource constraints.<sup>12</sup> Although the 2009-002 law guarantees the right to vote in any country where at least 100 Mauritians are registered,<sup>13</sup> in 2024 elections the government limited the coverage of polling stations to one per continent.<sup>14</sup> This decision has prevented significant diaspora communities, such as those in Senegal and Mali, from exercising their civic rights.
- Limited data: Mauritania's government lacks data on its diaspora, including their countries of residence, their competencies, and community dynamics, although initial research has reportedly been conducted to identify Mauritians in regions like Central Africa, the Gulf states, Europe, and North America. The data that exists appears limited to mapping exercises conducted by international organisations such as IOM and GRDR that now date back more than five years.<sup>15</sup><sup>16</sup> Mauritania's diaspora is geographically dispersed and often organises around village or regional networks, leading to informal, localised interactions rather than structured engagement with state authorities. Development projects initiated by diaspora members in their home regions are typically conducted independently of government authorities, sometimes with the support of international organisations, or through informal family and community networks.

Strategic mobilisation of the Diaspora during the COVID-19 Epidemic \(2021\)

In response to the COVID-19 epidemic, Mauritania worked with the IOM in 2021 to mobilise diaspora health experts. The initiative involved creating a framework to coordinate health and resource mobilisation efforts, leveraging the diaspora's skills and networks to address urgent health needs in Mauritania. Activities included remote training for health personnel, funding for medical supplies, and information campaigns to raise awareness. The collaboration highlighted the diaspora's role in health crises, promoting the connections between Mauritania and its overseas communities while demonstrating effective diaspora engagement in emergency response.

This 10-hectare project focuses on gardening production and was financed through diaspora crowdfunding, allowing both Mauritanian and Senegalese diaspora members originating from the region to acquire shares. The project has integrated an intergenerational dimension, with younger diaspora members born in North America and Europe making investments.
